"Do you realize the store loses money when you buy that baby food?" A young mother was shopping a supermarket in another town. A rep tending his product—another baby food brand—at the store that day was irked. He knew supermarket management sold the competing brand of baby food at a loss to create loyalty from key target consumers—mothers with young families. His comment, though, had the opposite impact of what he desired. The mother became more certain she was making the right choice. "After all," she thought, "my child does well with this brand, and it's a great price." Mothers make good decisions because their number one concern is their children. Happy Mother's Day!
