Swiss cheese, Swiss steak--you'd think they'd be related. But they don't seem to have anything in common. Swiss cheese has holes formed by gases developing as the cheese curds bind during the aging process (Swiss cheese cannot legally be sold as Swiss before its 60th day). Swiss steak starts life as an eye of round steak, but our meat cutters put the steak through a meat tenderizer, a tabletop machine with 2 rotating serrated blades. The blades break down the membranes, making the meat tender. Maybe that's the connection: Both Swiss cheese and Swiss steak undergo a process that improves flavor and texture. And perhaps, when we see a process that's superior, we just call it Swiss.
